A UTD professor created a database that catalogs school shootings across the country in hopes of preventing future tragedies.

Mali, the chapter’s treasurer, explained that the obstacle courses and relay races were brimming with water. “I hope people see this as a representation of the obstacles people across the world must go through to simply reach a clean source of water,” Mali said. “One of our relays is that you have to walk backwards, (representing that) the water’s not clean, or you might ‘get’ cholera or dengue fever because the water’s not clean,” Mali said. “So we’re just trying to educate people but in a fun way.”

UNICEF estimates that unclean and polluted water kills over 800 children a day. Soils of support car through the wind as students cheered on their fellow peers that were running to the finish line as fast their legs would allow. It was a simple game with a significant purpose: to enlighten students about the importance of water.
