Three Afghan women saw their lives upended when the Taliban seized their country last year. Now, thousands of miles from home, they set out to reclaim their dreams.

On moving day, Zulaikha pauses for a moment just outside her host family’s living room. The Eugene, Ore. house where she’s lived for the past month is filled with colorful reminders of its owners’ foreign travel and international guests. A blue and white teapot from Ukraine sits on a shelf underneath a colorfully painted plate from the Soviet Union. Across the room, a silk embroidery from China depicting cherry blossoms hangs on the wall. Zulaikha, who came to Eugene after fleeing the Taliban in Afghanistan, didn’t bring many tangible reminders of her home country. But she and Zahra and Maryam — the other Afghan women staying in the house — have filled it with more evocative pieces of their culture. There’s been a dinner of Kabuli Pulao, conversations split between English and their native language, and their left-over habit of never wearing shoes inside.

On this January day, before the three women move into their own place, Zulaikha, dressed in dark jeans and a flannel shirt and sporting short brown hair and round glasses, sets her hand on the wall just outside of the living room. She wrinkles her face in a feigned sob. “I’m going to miss here. I don’t want to leave here,” she says.

Despite being sad to leave the home of Janet Anderson and Evelyn Anderton, their hosts since arriving in Eugene, Zulaikha, Zahra and Maryam are excited to move into their new place. The rental is closer to the University of Oregon campus, where they are studying English on a scholarship. After completing their English coursework, Zulaikha, Zahra and Maryam plan to continue the educations and careers they’d started in Afghanistan, in journalism, law and medicine, respectively.

While most Afghan refugees who relocated to Eugene are single men or with their families, Zulaikha, Zahra and Maryam came on their own. In a new city without family or old friends, they are up against homesickness, despite being sad to leave the home of Janet Anderson and Evelyn Anderton, whose house they’ve transitioned into their new home.

Despite not knowing each other for long, the three Afghan women bonded over their shared journey.

Journey to Eugene

About three hours from Green Bay, Wisconsin, Fort McCoy spans 60,000 acres. Forty acres of the U.S. military base are used for live-fire or maneuvers training. Elsewhere are sprawling rows of white barracks. For about six months this fall and winter, they became temporary homes for Afghan refugees.

Fort McCoy is one of seven military bases that hosted Afghan refugees. At one point, the bases were home to 13,000 Afghan refugees as individuals and families waited for immigration paperwork, employment authorizations and health screenings to be processed. The U.S. government then coordinated with refugee resettlement agencies throughout the country to assign refugees more permanent locations to live in.

For five months, Zulaikha’s daily life at Fort McCoy consisted largely of working at the base’s medical center as an interpreter. She had enjoyed working as an interpreter for the U.S. Armed Forces in Afghanistan, but life was different on the base.

Zulaikha didn’t eat or sleep much at Fort McCoy, she said. Up to 220 women stayed in barracks with about 20 in one room, coming and going at all hours of day and night. “I hate Fort McCoy, it was so boring,” she said. “Every day, the same meal, the same people, the same place.”

When a friend from the base told her about a scholarship the University of Oregon’s Academic English Institute was offering for refugees, she thought, “Let’s try it. I would be better than doing nothing.” When she was accepted and started planning her journey to Eugene, she “was so happy. I just wanted to get out of there.”

While waiting for the women’s arrival in Oregon, Anderson and Anderton — who had agreed to host the women — bought three friendship bracelets from a souvenir from one of the first cultural exchanges they did in Ukraine. The program, Women’s Action for Nuclear Disarmament, brought U.S. residents to the Soviet Union and vice versa, with the goal of showing people’s humanity in both countries.

“Wherever you go, people behave like you’re family,” she said. “Anywhere — my teachers, the neighbors, the shopkeepers. They are so friendly.”

The community activates

The trapset in Anderson and Anderton’s living room is a souvenir from one of the first cultural exchanges they did in Ukraine. The program, Women’s Action for Nuclear Disarmament, brought U.S. residents to the Soviet Union and vice versa, with the goal of showing people’s humanity in both countries.

The couple would bring back wooden toys and display them at the Lane County Fair. Anderton remembers one faigero who, after learning where the toys were from, asked: “They have toys in the Soviet Union?”

“That’s how inhuman we thought they were,” Anderson recalled.

International exchanges — both traveling and hosting — became ways for the pair to learn from different cultures. They’ve traveled throughout the Middle East and Asia and hosted international UO students and travelers from an exchange program for people with disabilities.

“That’s a way to break down barriers, to have Americans realize that people are people no matter where they are,” Anderson said.

After COVID-19 hit, it was just the two of them in their Eugene home with three extra bedrooms. Then, last fall, they reached out to Emily Heilbrun — a facilitator for a local volunteer group that supports refugees and asylum seekers, and an old friend of Anderton’s — to ask if there was anything they could do to help Afghan refugees coming to Eugene. A plan to host one refugee then grew into two, then three, Anderson said.

The Refugee Resettlement Coalition, Heilbrun’s group, works closely with Catholic Community Services of Lane County, an agency that helps refugees resettle. CCS staff provide immigration legal services and support for asylum seekers. RRC trains advocates (like Anderson and Anderton) who connect with refugees and support them when they transition into their new home.

CCS committed to helping 33 Afghan refugees resettle in Eugene, a figure based partially on the $18 million community members stepped up to help, Heilbrun said. "We definitely had more people coming and saying, 'What can I do?' People coming forward with some housing options and donations," Heilbrun said. "Thankfully, we couldn't do this without so many people being willing."

Some volunteers help refugees find housing through host families, rental units or hotels using public assistance. Lack of housing is one of the biggest barriers for refugees coming from Afghanistan, Heilbrun said, and one of the reasons CCS has accepted mostly individuals and not families.

One volunteer, a social worker named Nancy Murakami, originally signed up to be an advocate. But as her training started, she and the CCS staff recognized that she could use her specializations in trauma and refugee mental health to bolster the behavioral health support available for refugees. She developed mental health support groups where arriving Afghans could connect with each other.

Murakami said that while many advocates aren't trained mental health professionals, they still provide effective psychosocial support. Murakami said advocates communicate: "you matter. I'm new to you, but you matter, and you're in my community, and I want to welcome you."

Daily life in a different culture

On a Sunday evening in February, Zulaikha was steaming a pot full of rice and chicken on Anderson and Anderton's electric stove. She was preparing Kabuli Pulao, an Afghan dish with rice, meat, spices and raisins — although Zulaikha was using cranberries, not commonly found in Afghanistan, as there weren't enough raisins in the house.

"I was okay with that. I don't take it seriously. I just wear what I want," Zulaikha said. "I just want myself to be happy." In the women's living room, three bikes donated by a local volunteer had been leaned against the wall, although Zulaikha said they wouldn't use them. It's not a common activity for women in Afghanistan.

"I don't have a sister, I just have six brothers. In Afghanistan, girls don't ride the bike and the car; she has to stay at home or go to college on the bus," Maryam said.

"My brother help me; I know everything, with men."

Zulaikha said women in Afghanistan are expected to wear scarves while playing sports, which can be a deter-ent, especially in hot weather. Swimming is also frowned on. In Eugene, the three women have visited the YMCA, navigating cultural differences can be difficult. Murakami, who leads the mental health support groups, said, "Just everything that is important about one's culture that we live and breathe, and it guides who we are, what we think about, suddenly is not something that they can rely on."

In a new environment, the women's school and work schedules, while tiring, have given them a sense of normacy. Their classes run most of the day through Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday, Zahra and Maryam work eight-hour shifts at the Graduate Hotel, cleaning rooms. In Afghanistan, their lives were similarly busy, with days that often started at 5 or 6 a.m. and were filled with work, school and helping their families around the house. Usually they didn't end their days until late in the evening. "Every time I'm at work and learning, it's normal," Maryam said. "I like work, and I like lessons. It helps me not think about bad things in my life."

Starting over

In the field of refugee mental health in the U.S., the guiding framework is called the triple trauma paradigm, Murakami said. Clinicians often approach the challenges and trauma facing refugees as three groups: pre-flight, in-flight and post-flight.

"Post-flight" refers to the obstacles in the country of resettlement, like cultural and linguistic differences, lack of resources and the inability to work in a profession someone is trained in.

"That's not the vision that most people have of the United States," Murakami said, "and not the hope for most people who are leaving a bad situation hoping to go to a place that's better."

Reaching an immigration status that ensures refugees can remain in the U.S. is also a challenge. Refugees who worked for the U.S. government or aided the U.S. Armed Forces can apply for Special Immigration Visas that provide permanent residency. Others are humanitarian paroles who entered the country without a visa and must still apply for asylum and go through the immigration process.

Murakami said a major disadvantage for parolees is they can't petition to have family join them in the U.S. "Their family members are still there, and they don't know when they're going to be reunited with them, and that is just tearing people apart," she said.

For Zulaikha, Zahra and Maryam, one of the biggest obstacles is having to start over with their education and finding the money to do so.

After earning a bachelor's degree Maryam worked as a midwife in Afghanistan, but her qualifications don't transfer to the U.S. She's searching for scholarships, so she can eventually study to become a nurse. Zulaikha and Zahra are in similar situations, as they aim to study journalism and law.

Murakami said many refugees also struggle to navigate parts of life that used to be effortless, such as driving or scheduling appointments, because of linguistic, cultural or systematic differences in a new country.

Some challenges are easy for Zulaikha, Zahra and Maryam to brush off — like the first time they took a McKenzie Bridge, an hour east of Eugene. They came home cheerfully telling Anderson and Anderton, "We saw the mountains today." Other times the challenges have been more serious, like when Zahra ran into issues...
The Journey That Changed a Life
written by Zulaikha

The pain of losing a house is impossible to describe. The house in Afghanistan where we used to feel the warmth of a complete family and care of friends, where we had our own jobs and lived a happy life with our loved ones.

I used to wake up seeing a bright smile on the lips of my mother and hearing the morning greetings from my father and siblings; my loved ones who were making my life full of joy and happiness.

But my happiness did not last long and I lost everything the warmth and love of my family, my job, friends and the opportunity to continue my studies.

When I was leaving Afghanistan, I had nothing and no one by my side. I was sad and alone. I saw my country falling into the hands of wild people who had no idea how to live in a city and what is education. The people who were not accepting that man and women have equal rights in a society.

The new chapter of my life started when I arrived in the United States, my new home where I have gotten the chance to meet new and kind people. They were sharing their happiness with me in order to decrease the pain that I have in my heart.

They helped me emotionally, financially, and I am really grateful for what they did and still do for me. These people gave me the strength and motivation not to start life from the bottom once again and create a new identity.

I will show the world the power that girls have and women hold. I will prove that we are strong enough to fight back in order to achieve what we have lost once.

Amid the chaos of packing, Zulaikha takes a moment to play with Cricket, Anderson and Anderson's miniature Goldendoodle.

Changing connections

On a Friday afternoon in March, Maryam, with a long, dark ponytail and rose-colored headband that matches her shirt, sits with Zulaikha and Zahra in the living room of their new home. They talk about their different family situations.

Maryam's family, who mostly lives in California, is upset that she's a single woman living on her own. They want her to either marry or join them.

"I say, 'I need a tall man, a handsome man, and brown skin' and they find me..." she trails off and makes a displeased face.

"You shouldn't marry a guy, you should live by your own," Zulaikha advises. "You're independent."

"No! That's not good!" Maryam exclaims. "Who can help me change the furniture?" she asks, laughing.

When she visits her family in California, her parents ask her to stay with them. She can't find scholarship opportunities in California, though, and her family members, many of whom don't speak fluent English, haven't been able to help.

"Every time I go, they tell me, 'You need husband? We find it. You need money? We buy for you,'" she says. "I think all of life is not money. Education is important."

Zulaikha's family supports her living situation, but she isn't able to see them. They've been hiding in their Afghan home as the Taliban is looking for some family members who also worked with the U.S. military. She misses them — especially her dad.

Growing up, her father encouraged her to make her own decisions.

"I'm same as my dad," Zulaikha says. "He's independent and he doesn't like women to be dependent on any man. He always told me, 'Now you're young and you know what is good and what is bad. You have to do what you want. But don't worry, whatever you do, I'm going to support you.' And that's why I love him so much.

The separation from friends and family is a significant post-flight challenge, Murakami said. It often means starting over in a new social environment without much support.

Zulaikha says she misses "my job, my university, especially my friends." She calls her family in Afghanistan every night and her best friend from the military, who's now in Virginia, a few times a week.

A lack of community and the safety net it provides often stresses refugees in the U.S., Murakami said. There's a sense of security in knowing that, when life gets difficult, your neighbors will help you out. "Not having trust in those around you, because you don't yet have a relationship with them, I think is really scary," she said.

She said advocates like Anderson and Anderson play a prominent role in helping new community members plant their social roots.

For Zulaikha, friends and social support have been one of the most helpful factors when resettling in Eugene — especially her host couple.

"I never want to lose them," she says. Anderson and Anderton are one reason she plans to stay in Eugene with Zahra even after finishing her English courses at the JIOC. Her goals include, first, retaking a course she got a B in after arriving halfway through the term.

Then she hopes to find a scholarship or donations she can use to study journalism. "I want to be the most famous journalist in the U.S.," she says. On the living room couch, Maryam teases Zulaikha about how the Kabuli Pulao dinner turned out and an incident the day before when Zulaikha kissed Maryam before telling her, "You remind me of my father."

"I usually kiss my father," Zulaikha explains, laughing. "I miss him too much." A little earlier, Zulaikha had recounted how, despite missing friends and family from home, she had immediately felt welcomed by Anderson and Anderton when she arrived in Eugene, and bonded quickly with Zahra and Maryam, too.

Although she'd seen Zahra briefly at Fort McCoy, Zulaikha didn't really know either of the women before arriving in Eugene. "I just met them here," she says. "But here, we get very close to each other, and right now we are like sisters."
